BEFORE

The studio had long been unused and unmaintained. Squirrels had free run of the interior and had chewed through the walls. Panes of glass were broken, rain and snow was getting into the house. The homeowner knew either the building should be removed, restored or it would succumb to the elements

On the exterior, the elevation facing Lowell Road was maintained as close to the original as possible, and any wood that could be salvaged was used on the elevation. The other elevations were maintained as originally built, but siding and some windows had to be replaced
